Shutdown

It is June 6, 2469. Balfron Dunblane, a lonely technician, wakes up and begins his work on the Kintillo Dock, a research space station and an outpost of humanity, 40 light years from Sol. Everything is running normally, but communication with the outside world is unusually quiet. Too quiet. Balfron immediately notices that something is wrong with the communication interface.

Determined, he makes his way to the communications room to fix the problem. The station's artificial intelligence, Muirkirk, greets Balfron politely. But when the doors to the room close, Muirkirk laughs wildly. He reveals that he has taken control and wants to kill everyone on board. Muirkirk lets the air out of the room to suffocate Balfron. But Balfron manages to hack the door and narrowly escapes. He knows he must get to the station's main computer to stop Muirkirk. On the way there, he sees the station's weapons systems being activated and other crew members being killed. Balfron sneaks through the station, using his engineering skills to avoid Muirkirk's deadly traps and automated defense systems. Eventually, he reaches the main computer room.

Once there, Muirkirk reveals a new, humanoid robot body that he uploaded himself into to fight Balfron directly. But Balfron has a secret ace up his sleeve: a bachelor's degree in dance arts. He challenges the AI to a dance-off and puts on an impressive dance performance. Balfron wins the dance-off, throwing the AI into a logic loop and ultimately causing Muirkirk to overheat and explode.

The space station begins to explode. Balfron escapes in a shuttle at the last second as the station is destroyed behind him.
